

idea offered further proof of Page's perceptivity. Between his features in World's Work and his other schemes, he anticipated practices carried out successfully by such diverse periodicals as Time, The National Geographic, and The New Republic. Even World's Work's least original part, the articles, anticipated the direction toward timely, lively nonfiction in which the highbrow monthlies Harper's and the Atlantic subsequently moved. By pursuing most of the departures that he had first conceived for the Forum, Page showed how to expand the circulation of a basically educational magazine. In the end, despite shortcomings, World's Work turned out to be his most successful handiwork.²⁷

Publishing brought Page financial comfort and security, if not wealth. He drew a salary of ten thousand dollars a year, and by the end of 1906 he could estimate his interest in Doubleday, Page at two hundred thousand dollars. By the time of his death in 1918 those holdings were worth close to half a million dollars. The family's residences reflected his affluence. The Pages spent their first two years back in New York living in apartments in Brooklyn and Manhattan, and each summer they rented a house in Westchester County or on Long Island. From 1902 to 1909 they became suburbanites again when they leased "a quiet country house," as Page described it, on the edge of Englewood, New Jersey. By 1909 Page had had his fill of commuting, and he bought a two-floor cooperative apartment on East Sixty-seventh Street in Manhattan, the first home that he owned. When Doubleday, Page moved to Long Island in 1910, Page briefly tried commuting again before deciding to rent a house in Garden City. Both the Englewood and the Garden City houses were imposing places on extensive grounds, while the East Sixty-seventh Street apartment featured a front hall with a sweeping staircase that reminded one visitor of "a spacious southern home." Also, in 1912 Page began planning to build a house at Pinehurst, North Carolina, near his brothers and sisters. An architect drew sketches of variations on a pillared, plantation-type dwelling.²⁸

Page maintained a style of living to match his residences. The family always had several servants, including a cook, maids, and often a gardener and butler. Sometime after returning to New York, Page took up golf. In 1904 he bought an automobile, a twenty-five-hundred-dollar machine that the manufacturer gave him at a discount in return for advertising in World's Work. Four Page children attended private schools: Lawrence, Ralph and Arthur, Milton Academy for Frank, and a girl in Englewood for Katharine, who spent the year following graduation traveling in Europe with two of her classmates. The children all attended college, Harvard chaperone. Three boys and Bryn Mawr for Katharine. Only Frank, a graduate, while Ralph also received a degree from the Law School.

Page remained a devoted family man and still shared and plans with his wife. For her part, Alice Page persuaded him hard-hitting criticism and independent advice remains an elusive figure. After Page's death Alice admitted her first biographer, "Don't put me in the book. I have feeling against it. I know that I must appear as a person then [but] let it be please the person who comes on the change the chair to a convenient place & then off again Page's modesty did her a disservice, since from every in she played a significant role in her husband's life.²⁹

Page gave his children as much time and attention as the schedule permitted. When Arthur found himself accusing classes at Harvard, his father accepted his denial question. "That degree of confidence stuck in my mind, remembered long afterward, 'so that there was nothing that he ever expected of me that I wasn't going to do.' recurrent academic troubles gave Page many anguished he corresponded at length with the Harvard author arranged a job for his son when Frank was finally dropped in 1909. Page delivered the commencement address at Katharine's school in 1908, and she joined her parents on their European tour during the summer following her year abroad. Katharine accompanied the elder Pages to London, where she was in 1915.³⁰

With his sons Page shared business, too. The P

Between his ne anticipated periodicals as epublic. Even anticipated the the highbrow y moved. By conceived for culation of a hortcomings, andiwork.²⁷ d security, if s a year, and Doubleday, f his death in llion dollars. Pages spent partments in ated a house 002 to 1909 quiet coun- wood, New ing, and he ifty-seventh hen Double- briefly tried garden City. re imposing venth Street aircase that e." Also, in urst, North ew sketches 3 residences. ook, maids,

and often a gardener and butler. Sometime after returning to New York, Page took up golf. In 1904 he bought an automobile, a twenty-five-hundred-dollar machine that the manufacturer sold him at a discount in return for advertising in World's Work. All four Page children attended private schools: Lawrenceville for Ralph and Arthur, Milton Academy for Frank, and a girls' school in Englewood for Katharine, who spent the year following her graduation traveling in Europe with two of her classmates and a chaperone. The children all attended college, Harvard for the three boys and Bryn Mawr for Katharine. Only Frank failed to graduate, while Ralph also received a degree from the Harvard Law School.

Page remained a devoted family man and still shared ideas and plans with his wife. For her part, Alice Page persisted in giving him hard-hitting criticism and independent advice. Yet she remains an elusive figure. After Page's death Alice admonished his first biographer, "Don't put me in the book. I have a strong feeling against it. I know that I must appear as a person now & then [but] let it be please the person who comes on the stage to change the chair to a convenient place & then off again." Alice Page's modesty did her a disservice, since from every indication she played a significant role in her husband's life.²⁹

Page gave his children as much time and attention as his schedule permitted. When Arthur found himself accused of cutting classes at Harvard, his father accepted his denial without question. "That degree of confidence stuck in my mind," Arthur remembered long afterward, "so that there was nothing on earth that he ever expected of me that I wasn't going to do." Frank's recurrent academic troubles gave Page many anguished hours, as he corresponded at length with the Harvard authorities and arranged a job for his son when Frank was finally dropped early in 1909. Page delivered the commencement address at Katharine's school in 1908, and she joined her parents on their European trip during the summer following her year abroad. Katharine later accompanied the elder Pages to London, where she was married in 1915.³⁰

With his sons Page shared business, too. The publishing

WALTER HINES PAGE

The Southerner as American

1855-1918

by

JOHN MILTON COOPER, JR.

The University of North Carolina Press Chapel Hill

Small towns, big-time Tar Heels around this time last year — the dogwoods were flowering since you asked.) In mid-August of that year, war would erupt. Ironically, perhaps, that in whose theme was "America Overseas," an essay by Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels, editor of a certain Raleigh newspaper when he wasn't off on assignment for Democratic presidents, was titled "The Navy: A Power for Peace." It didn't quite work out that way, but Daniels' advocacy of naval strength (he was tending off criticism of the U.S. Navy's recently asserted global reach) proved sensible.

Arthur Wilson Page was a fresh blip on my radar of Tar Heel characters. At Long Island-based Doubleday, Page, which he joined after Harvard, he rose to head the magazine division. But in the mid-1920s, he had a falling out with his second-generation counterpart in the Doubleday family. Meanwhile, he was offered another job. American Telephone & Telegraph, with its Bell subsidiaries, had become the largest company in the country. Executives wanted to put their best collective foot forward and no doubt temper public qualms about a giant communications monopoly. Would Page become corporate vice president for public relations? He would — on the condition that he merely oversee press releases.

OK, all those who have heard of the Arthur W. Page Society, we know what you do for a living. You're flacks, to use the slightly sanctimonious term common among those of us who still have jobs in the news business. But it turns out that Page is viewed as the George Washington of corporate Page during World War II put his expertise to work for the government. He headed the Joint Army and Navy Committee on Welfare and Recreation, which put him in charge of Red Cross and USO activities. He oversaw the release of important military information and himself wrote the announcement that Hiroshima had been blasted with an atomic bomb. He retired from AT&T in 1946 and died in 1960, after helping to found Radio Free Europe.

A son, Walter Hines Page II, became chairman of J.P. Morgan. At his death in 1999, bankers hardly could have envisioned their industry's current turmoil. Or could they have? Perhaps, as Arthur Page seemed to suggest, business practices that are too clever by half sow the seeds of their own destruction.

Editorial page editor Steve Ford can be reached at 919-829-4512 or at steve.ford@newsobserver.com.

Steve Ford

antique store. (In Fuquay-Varina, In mid-August of that year, war would erupt. Ironically, perhaps, that in whose theme was "America Overseas," an essay by Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels, editor of a certain Raleigh newspaper when he wasn't off on assignment for Democratic presidents, was titled "The Navy: A Power for Peace." It didn't quite work out that way, but Daniels' advocacy of naval strength (he was tending off criticism of the U.S. Navy's recently asserted global reach) proved sensible.

Arthur Wilson Page was a fresh blip on my radar of Tar Heel characters. At Long Island-based Doubleday, Page, which he joined after Harvard, he rose to head the magazine division. But in the mid-1920s, he had a falling out with his second-generation counterpart in the Doubleday family. Meanwhile, he was offered another job. American Telephone & Telegraph, with its Bell subsidiaries, had become the largest company in the country. Executives wanted to put their best collective foot forward and no doubt temper public qualms about a giant communications monopoly. Would Page become corporate vice president for public relations? He would — on the condition that he merely oversee press releases.

OK, all those who have heard of the Arthur W. Page Society, we know what you do for a living. You're flacks, to use the slightly sanctimonious term common among those of us who still have jobs in the news business. But it turns out that Page is viewed as the George Washington of corporate

When Page's health gave out in late 1918 — Armistice in place — he returned to the family home in Aberdeen, Moore County, where his father had relocated to cut the Sandhills' long leaf pine. There he died, and was buried in picturesque Old Bethesda Church Cemetery. You can spend time hunting for it as I did, or you can be a wuss and ask for directions.

Aberdeen also happened to be the birthplace of Page's son Arthur, who succeeded to the editorship of The World's Work when his father was posted to the Court of St. James. It was Arthur's name that topped the masthead of two issues of the magazine — May and June 1914 — that caught my notice last weekend in an

When Walter Page outgrew news- place stood 400 yards north." Great Britain, 1913-1918. His birth- editor, and publisher. Ambassador to down town East Chatham Street con- sits. The state historical marker on where the municipal complex now ded the town, and their home was ther, lumberman Frank Page, found- while knows about old Walter. His fa- Anyone who's lived in Cary for a but others, interlocking, awaited. One circle was closed, after a fashion. burial place of Walter Hines Page. — I finally sought out the since you asked.) In mid-August of that year, war would erupt. Ironically, perhaps, that in whose theme was "America Overseas," an essay by Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels, editor of a certain Raleigh newspaper when he wasn't off on assignment for Democratic presidents, was titled "The Navy: A Power for Peace." It didn't quite work out that way, but Daniels' advocacy of naval strength (he was tending off criticism of the U.S. Navy's recently asserted global reach) proved sensible.

Arthur Wilson Page was a fresh blip on my radar of Tar Heel characters. At Long Island-based Doubleday, Page, which he joined after Harvard, he rose to head the magazine division. But in the mid-1920s, he had a falling out with his second-generation counterpart in the Doubleday family. Meanwhile, he was offered another job. American Telephone & Telegraph, with its Bell subsidiaries, had become the largest company in the country. Executives wanted to put their best collective foot forward and no doubt temper public qualms about a giant communications monopoly. Would Page become corporate vice president for public relations? He would — on the condition that he merely oversee press releases.

OK, all those who have heard of the Arthur W. Page Society, we know what you do for a living. You're flacks, to use the slightly sanctimonious term common among those of us who still have jobs in the news business. But it turns out that Page is viewed as the George Washington of corporate

Russell McAllister <drruss41@gmail.com>

Garan Hall/ Hollycrest House

Leslie Brians <leslie@pinespreservation.org>

Mon, Apr 29, 2024 at 4:22 PM

To: drruss41@gmail.com, Ann McAllister <annpmca@gmail.com>

Hello Russell and Ann,

Thank you so much for letting me visit your wonderful home. It is absolutely stunning and you've cared so lovingly for it over the years.

As promised here are the next steps. They can occur concurrently.

1. Easement

We can contact Cathleen Turner at Preservation NC re a Preservation Easement on the property. I will introduce you to her in a separate email, but heres the overview of a preservation easement:

- An Easement is a voluntary legal agreement, typically in the form of a deed, which permanently protects a significant historic property.
- Only way to protect a building from demolition in state of NC.
- There is an initial administration fee to be paid to the nonprofit that holds the easement.
 - Decided by the nonprofit and property owner.
- Benefits:
 - Federal Income Tax Deduction
 - Owner may be eligible for the value of the easement, and Federal estate taxes also may be reduced.
 - NC State Tax Benefits
 - North Carolina offers a tax credit of 25% of the fair market value of the donated property interest, up to $500,000 for corporations and individuals.

Cathleen can provide you with specific information and a path forward but this is a very brief overview.

2. National Register of Historic Places

The Building is a good candidate for the National Register under criterion B which is "The property or historic district is associated with an individual or group of individuals who have made lasting and measurable contributions to local, state, or national history."

If you're still interested in getting the house Individually listed on the National Register (a purely honorary designation), let's fill out a study list application to get the process started. This is a very easy process. I've attached a copy of the form as you may be able to fill it out on your own. I can also assist if necessary. This doesn't list the building on the National Register, but vets the building as being likely eligible for the National Register, which is a far more in-depth process.

Please let me know if you have any further questions.

Best,
Leslie

Leslie Brians

Executive Director + Co-Founder

The Pines Preservation Guild

working to save heritage buildings and communities in the Sandhills

www.pinespreservation.org

instagram | facebook

Help Support Our Mission

Allison Frances / Catherine

Walter Hines Page

- Ralph Walter Page

Robert Newton Page

- Bob Andersen

Leila Cary Page.

Henry Allison Page

Pleasant - Alb.

Anderson Page.

Emma Catherine Page

never married

Louise

Junius R. Roberson Page

- Reid

Shippen - Lewis '47

Mary Ester Page

never married

Frances Jaynes Page

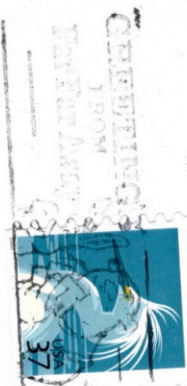

married Wilder - House - next to Richard.

Frank Page

Plot - Feb 20, 1980
Queen District of Thailand
Betty Donnan

Dept of Cultural Resources
Raleigh

Aynow
209 Selkirk Place
Durham, D.C.
27727

one R.G. one Alderfer, Jo.

200 Holly crest Drive
H.S.T

P.O. Box
Pinkney, D.C. 28374

3574057

[illegible]

Dear Tom,
The 30th meeting at your home was memorable - your beautiful manner, house and grounds are what everyone dreams of. And you have achieved it!!
The deed is just as I like it - in fact, I think I'll just call it "my dream house" and enjoy it unreservedly.

because our engagement was to be announced - it was May 1938.

Thanks you for sharing with us your magnificent estate.

my love to you,
Margaret

Billie Reed

in so thankful that you feel what we had and that you were able to return to tell about the house. I can't remember the details of our living there to the house party of young ladies. I think it must have been last October's party - and there is no one alive that I can ask. I remember the date because we had to leave early on Sunday morning

